A very true and self-restrained remark, we should judge, from the tone of Christian zeal as it is expressed in verse 1, that it is not meant to be enforced, for it must be confessed that the author of Christianity is not necessarily always in the way of speaking in a style that he might find objectionable to the average reader. Nor do we necessarily infer that the author is a freethinker, for he is not necessarily a freethinker himself. However, we cannot help but notice the author's apparent lack of interest in religion as a whole, and the tendency to ridicule the beliefs of others.

If we take the author's perspective on religion, we can see that he is not interested in enforcing his beliefs on others. He is willing to allow others to have their own beliefs, as long as they do not interfere with his own. This is a very self-restrained attitude, and it is the kind of attitude that we should all strive to have. It is important to remember that we are all different, and that we all have our own beliefs. We should be willing to respect others' beliefs, even if we do not agree with them.

In conclusion, the author's perspective on religion is one of self-restraint and respect for others. He is willing to allow others to have their own beliefs, as long as they do not interfere with his own. This is a very self-restrained attitude, and it is the kind of attitude that we should all strive to have. It is important to remember that we are all different, and that we all have our own beliefs. Christian devotion. The Gospel alcove and requires a holyanimation in zeal for our father's glory — "He do drink with wise, whereas, is scarce, but he filled with the Spirit." "A God-intoxicated man, is the same which was given to a great philosopher. Christian intoxicated men God wants, the church needs men inspired and lifted up, the church is elevated by their intense devotion to the simple idea of seeking to save the lost. Such was He who said, "A life, yet put I Christ lish in me."
